So, for the layout of the YouTube website, I first look for the header, main, sidebar and footer. I easily found the header, sidebar and main, but the footer is not the same as the other websites. It is on the sidebar, and you need to scroll down there to see it. Then after that it is pretty easy labeling them.

For the header I didn't break them because they are just elements, then for the main, I broke them into category filter and main video grid, the category filter controls what the main video grid displays. Then the sidebar, I just broke them into home button, subscribed channel list, user data, explore section, YouTube links, settings and help, and the footer is also located there at the bottom. I just broke them based on their function and usage.
